

German Airlines Provide You With First-Class Services

German airlines fly to and from a number of international and domestic airports throughout Germany. They are a great choice for getting around Europe in an inexpensive manner. That's important these days when saving money is vital.

Because Germany is so central to the remainder of European countries, it makes a great place to have a base of operations for any vacation. It's so easy to get around, even when other legs of a journey take you to Switzerland, France or Italy.

In other words, airlines in Germany make getting around easier.

The larger German airlines, such as Lufthansa, Condor, LTU (no longer, see below), and Air Berlin, have flights not only within Germany, but also to other European cities and even world destinations. Getting around Germany is simple, but you can also fly to other medium and long distance destinations.

With 63 million passengers annually and a fleet size of more than 500 airplanes, Lufthansa is Germany's largest airline. It is also the second largest in Europe. You'll find reliably good service on Lufthansa, and it'll get to all German airports as well as europewide and worldwide destinations.

Since the competition can be quite strict among German airlines, you'll find the cost can vary with the larger providers. However, you can always find some good deals when you book online with internet specials. Naturally, saving some cash on a vacation is what it's all about!

LTU International Airlines started out as a charter airline, but now has service to most medium and some long distance destinations, even in the United States. This airline has very good customer service but can cost about the same or higher than Lufthansa.

Safety might be an important consideration for a traveler, and you'll find that LTU has a record of no fatalities in over 50 years of service. It's considered the safest airline in the world. This is a good choice when being safe while flying is a topmost concern.

Keep in mind, though, that LTU is now a subsidiary of Air Berlin and this very company announced to let the trademark LTU vanish.

Condor also started out, like LTU, as a charter service, but now flies to about 20 German airports. You can get around comfortably on any one of its 35 planes. An agent can arrange booking for you at any tourist office in Germany.

Of course, the more inexpensively you can travel the better. There are low-cost German airlines that may fit a traveler's needs better than the larger airlines. These fly from airports that aren't commonly used by other airlines, so it makes traveling much more convenient when you want to get into the backcountry.

Air Berlin is the second largest of airlines in Germany, carrying 28 million passengers annually. Their low-cost services are excellent for travelers who like to go on an economy vacation. They fly to beautiful holiday destinations within Germany as well as locales on the Mediterranean and the Canary Islands.

For plenty of cheap flights and good service, you can also fly on TUIfly. This is the third largest of all German airlines and it offers low-cost flying, as well as holiday packages. On most flights you can get complimentary refreshments.

Germanwings, based in Cologne, has many destinations within Europe. Another low-cost flying option, it's easy to book and convenient for the destinations important for tourists.

German airlines are proud to offer the best in travel opportunities. It makes for a pleasant and fun-filled vacation when you are able to get around with few difficulties. The airlines in Germany are always glad to be a part of easy travel.
